More than 100 men who spent a total of 50 years in the notorious Långholmen prison will get a share of the compensation package set up for victims of the country's bloodiest blood feud, a judicial source has told the Dagbladet daily. The figure of 100 inmates was given to Dagbladet by the Justice Ministry, which on Friday announced a plan to pay 80 million kronor (€8.7 million) to the relatives of the dead and 11 million kronor to the families of those who were wounded in the feud between the Erikson and Hansson families of Eskilstuna, east of Stockholm. The figure is based on the calculation of the two families' share of the original 13 million kronor that the state set aside for victims of the blood feud in 2007, the source said. The murder series, which lasted between 1897 and 1934 and claimed a total of 73 victims, centered around the dispute over a property on Långholmen island in Stockholm. The judicial source said that the rehabilitation of the inmates would not be a burden on the state, as the existing funding for prisoners has been used up by the payments to blood feud victims. But he added that inmates are entitled to a compensation package in line with that of their victims. "It will be a small sum, but it's better than nothing," he said, adding that the payment was comparable to the compensation for other crimes. He also said that the inmates would get "a little bit of money for the time they spent in prison," but he did not provide any details. The source said that the guilty have already served their sentences, so they are not entitled to money from the compensation package. The money is being paid over the course of the next four years and will include 4.7 million kronor per month, paid in increments of 1.1 million kronor. Use of the 'bubble' sign at ultrasound assessment of systolic function in patients with a recent myocardial infarction. Early systolic velocities (pulsed Doppler-S wave) obtained at an M-mode assessment of the left ventricular posterior wall thickness during diastole are assumed to reflect left ventricular systolic function. In contrast, recent studies using transthoracic M-mode

While New Zealand is taking a cautious approach to its preparation for an influx of asylum seekers expected to arrive next month, its immigration chief expects the country will receive the same number of asylum seekers as other member states, despite a dramatic reduction in refugee numbers from Australia. NZ's Immigration Minister Michael Woodhouse said last month that New Zealand was taking a cautious approach given the large number of asylum seekers who were expected to arrive in the country. The country's minister for the Law Commission, Bill English, said in October that the country could expect to receive 1000 to 2000 refugees from different regional groups, including Indonesia, Malaysia, and the Philippines. "Other countries generally (say) about 25 to 50 percent of their refugee intake comes from Indonesia," he said. "If you did the math, you'd say we'd probably get somewhere between 1000 and 2000." In September, when Mr. Woodhouse announced that arrivals from Australia were expected to peak over the month of November, he said that New Zealand had spent the last 12 months "devising and developing a system that can deal with these arrivals." New Zealand's public service minister, Winston Peters, made similar comments in late October, when he said the government had trained staff to assist asylum seekers arriving from Australia with their first steps in New Zealand. Asked about Mr. Peters' comments on Monday, Mr. Woodhouse said that there was always a risk when setting up a regional processing facility that the newly arrived asylum seekers could overwhelm the system. "Sometimes there are positive outcomes and, occasionally, there are not, but we've got to be prepared to deal with whatever situation we might receive," he said. "If you look at the countries that are potentially the most likely host countries, there is the possibility that there might be more people. We are expecting that there might be as many people, if not more." Mr. Woodhouse said that his department is helping to prepare for any influx of asylum seekers arriving from Australia, but warned that it was difficult to accurately predict the number of asylum seekers New Zealand is likely to receive. "It's not about the volume," he said. "It's more about the variety, the number of people who will come through."
