The evaluation of diaphragmatic ultrasonography before surgery: a comparison between thoracic surgeons and radiologists. To evaluate the usefulness of thoracic ultrasonography in the preoperative evaluation of pleural disease and in predicting the clinical course of diaphragmatic hernia repair. This prospective study included 64 patients with diaphragmatic hernia who underwent surgical repair between October 2002 and December 2003. Chest ultrasonography was performed for all patients using a linear 5.5-MHz probe. The sternal and costal fields were scanned in the longitudinal and transverse axis. Seventy-three thoracic surgical procedures were performed in the 64 patients, including 26 bilateral diaphragmatic hernias. There was no diagnosis of diaphragmatic hernia on the chest radiographs in 21 of the 64 patients (32.8%), and thoracic ultrasonography revealed diaphragmatic hernia in 31 of the 64 patients (48.4%). In 9 of these 31 patients (29.0%), ultrasonographic findings confirmed the presence of hernia on the chest radiograph. Eleven patients (17.2%) were diagnosed preoperatively as having diaphragmatic hernia by chest radiography and ultrasonography, while diaphragmatic hernia was confirmed at operation or postoperatively. For 81 of the 103 diaphragmatic hernia cases, the diagnoses made using ultrasonography did not differ from those made using thoracotomy. For 16 of the 103 diaphragmatic hernia cases, the diagnoses made using thoracic ultrasonography did not differ from those made using thoracotomy and were superior to those made by chest radiography. Thoracic ultrasonography is a more useful diagnostic tool for preoperatively determining the presence of diaphragmatic hernia than is chest radiography. A combination of chest ultrasonography and chest radiography might be used in the differential diagnosis between diaphragmatic hernia and pulmonary disease.The effects of hyperglycaemia and ketosis on pregnancy outcome in women with polycystic ovary syndrome. To assess the outcome of pregnancies in women with polycystic ovary syndrome (PCOS). Retrospective analysis of a database of patients attending a reproductive endocrinology service between January 1994 and December 1999. Women with PCOS who conceived during that period.
