And then just as finally just when the session ends and the data is just about to lock, but just before that all of these tables are suddenly deteriorating because all the writes are going into the global cluster anyway and now all the writers are just trying to retrieve their own pieces of data and writing into the same single cluster and then that cluster is just starting to cascade backwards and forwards. So, it's just not a very good idea to do something like that. And then the question is why do you think they all slow down. Why do they start to get slow and terrible? The response is that, sometimes, a lot of work can actually be done on things at the table if you're
