The city is planning to use a new "barrier" system to keep pedestrians and vehicles safe in extreme cold weather. Mayor John Tory says the $2.9 million system, which will be installed in the warmer weather, will "defend against uncontrolled ice accumulation" on city streets and sidewalks. The barrier system consists of a network of sensors buried in the pavement that indicate the temperature on a certain stretch of road. Read more: Here's how you can make the biggest difference in fighting Toronto's cold weather Markham, North York and Toronto prepare for snowfall The sensors detect sub-freezing temperatures and activate a warning system that makes noises and flashes lights. A certain stretch of road or sidewalk will be de-iced and otherwise prepared to accommodate pedestrians and cars. The barrier is part of a multi-million dollar investment in winter weather preparedness by the
