Q: Using Tooltip with pivotchartSeries1 in Excel I have a pivotchartseries object and would like to use a tooltip object. I'm calling the tooltip by using an Excel API command. Tooltip t = worksheet.PivotTables(1).PivotCharts(1).PivotFields(1).ToolTips.Add(1, 1, 200, 100, false) as Tooltip; It works well when creating the object. However, if I'm trying to get current tools like such: var t = worksheet.PivotTables(1).PivotCharts(1).PivotFields(1).ToolTips.CurrentItem; It does not work giving Error: Object does not match this typed array. at Microsoft.Office.Interop.Excel.PivotTables.ChartObjects.get_Item(Object Item) at Microsoft.Office.Interop.Excel.PivotTables.PivotFields.ToolTips.CurrentItem() What am I doing wrong here? A: Try to use Globals Application.GotoWorkbook(wdWorkbook) Application.GotoSheet(1) Application.GotoChart("PivotTable1").Chart.ToolTips.Add("i", "i") it will work when you need to get values. And also I suppose application need to be open: Application.CurrentWorkbook.OpenSht(1) or to get sheet name Application.Sheets(Sheet_Name).range(sheetname) let me know Have a look at these two guys. They're stark raving mad. If you click on the link below, you'll see a

What's new in Nevertales: Faryon Collector's Edition:

From Original Trilogy Has Been Released Share: If you're looking for some vintage background music to go with some vintage movies and vintage scenes being re-enacted, well, look no further. The current space fantasy fad has inspired many in the genre to start sprinkling a little time and effort into their production numbers in order to take advantage of the effect that the music has on a scene. And why shouldn't they? This track from the original Star Wars trilogy is an absolute classic, and has been getting used so much that they had to turn it into an official release for all you fans of the epic space battles featured in the films. Star Wars: Hyperspace Dogfights Soundtrack by John Williams is now available on iTunes, Amazon, and Google Play. Reading from Amazon: Electronic backdrops introduce a sonic nod to the look of the original Star Wars Trilogy. This almost ten-minute studio recording, produced by Mr. Williams, may be an instance of genius, but it was also agonizingly difficult to create. The music sequence was recorded with Mr. Williams conducting the orchestra, painstakingly guiding it as the action was re-created on location, one scene at a time. Audio artists assembled and edited the original scenes on a real sound stage at Skywalker Ranch, simulating locations from a variety of scenes, beginning with the opening shots of the film and concluding with the space battle. As a nod to the video games that allowed fans of the films to actually fight sequences on a miniature battlefield, Mr. Williams composed a score that was carefully shaped and edited with custom-built and appropriately-sized drums and keyboards. With a handpicked ensemble that included the City of

Prague Philharmonic; the London Symphony Orchestra; the New York City Ballet Orchestra; the electronic chimes, horns, and percussion of the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra; the steel pans and cow bell of the London Symphony Orchestra Brass; and the guitars, accordions, and musical saws of the Philharmonia Orchestra, Mr. Williams documented the performances of the final version with two stereo audio recordings. Based on the original scenes as captured by the sound recordists, Mr. Williams and assistant Derek Bermel placed the vocals, which included sounds captured throughout the re-creation process, in the recording studios to craft an appropriate application for the music. The song “Hyperspace.” was re-cut, re-recorded, and re-mixed with
