Recently, the web is inundated with instances of CRC errors. But only one of them has turned out to be very bad The horrible news for all of us, on the other hand, is a crack for SecureDrop leaked online, reports The Intercept. All the code was published at Github and contains an execution instruction for a remote network service, which, as Edward Snowden pointed out, means it could act as a backdoor. As reported by The Intercept, the leak came courtesy of a computer belonging to a person who is under indictment, but the identity of the person is unknown. The SecureDrop crack was present in the project for years, but only surfaced last week when new code was integrated. The Intercept's account is based on a phone interview with the individual responsible for the hack and other anonymous sources. The leaker used a Russian account, and no one seems to be aware of him or her. The leaked code was published more than a year ago. But last week it was added to the public repository and then made available. While the code is clean and free of malicious commands, this means it is likely more unhandled or unallowed. So far there are no reports of tampering, only abuses or leaks. It is also worth noting that today it is less secure than it was a year ago, if you take into account how much the Snowden leaks has changed our perspective on national security, privacy, and government surveillance. SecureDrop is a whistleblowing platform that allows a whistleblower to upload material that has been made available at that site. It uses a system based on https, which means that the site cannot be accessed using a proxy or Tor. SecureDrop is decentralized, so it doesn't rely on a single point of failure or single owner to keep the data safe. However, it seems like the suspect we referred to isn't trustworthy.

Indeed, the system was never designed to be secure. SecureDrop was originally created by the Foundation for Defense of Democracies, which operates under the neoconservative ideology, and it got some support, at least originally, from the CIA. With Snowden's leak, the definition of threat evolved. While there has been some speculation about the CIA fearing that its technology might be leaked, the nature of the leak has likely had an impact on how the software was developed and tested. Apparently, it was designed with user agencies in mind, and given the public exposure, they don't seem to be satisfied with it. In fact, the Intercept wrote that "since it was leaked 0cc13bf012
