The monoclonal antibody, CEP-270 (murine IgG2a), reacts with the entire ectodomain of CD40L (approximately 137 amino acid residues). It can inhibit both in vitro and in vivo, both B- and T-dependent humoral immune responses (1-3), and interleukin-12 induced NK cell-mediated cytotoxicity (3). CD40 is a protein member of the TNFR family, is expressed on the surfaces of a wide variety of cell types and plays an important role in the regulation of immunity and inflammation. It was first identified as a product of the T-cell antigen receptor and is the major factor for antigen presenting cells to stimulate T-cell activation. It has now been found that CD40 is constitutively expressed on the surface of B cells, monocytes, thymic epithelial cells, and germinal center plasma cells (5). A soluble form of human CD40 (CD40-hFc) was generated by expression of the CD40 hFc fusion protein in E.coli. This soluble CD40-hFc protein was able to bind CD40 and block CD40-induced signals (4). Upon binding to CD40, CD40L induces binding of CD40 to the cytoplasmic domain of CD40 e79caf774b

The titular character of Batman Begins (2005), Bruce Wayne (Christian Bale) has become a billionaire he feels only through his professional pursuits and his unfulfilled goal of building a bat mobile. In the climax of the movie, he sets out to destroy a criminal figure of his past. Bruce Wayne gains help from a trained ex-military tactician, John Blake (Tom Hardy), who acts as his bodyguard during the part of the mission that requires the use of explosive devices. In the end, Bruce Wayne is captured by the police and placed under the custody of the same policeman who mocked him when he was a child. However, he manages to escape by changing into the guise of a bat and after using his martial art skills to fight off a mind-controlled opponent, he manages to make his way to a rooftop where he rips off the top of the building to his own death, and travels to a final resting place for the dead and turns himself into a bomb with the help of his ex-teacher, Alfred. But before Bruce Wayne passes, Robin (Michael Caine), his closest childhood friend and the heir to his fortune, arrives and salutes him from a light on top of the building. I just don't understand, why did Robin ever agree to fight in the trial of two criminals. Why not Bruce Wayne? A: I think that, in the end, Bruce is ready to die: He escapes from Arkham after the mind-controlled Bane breaks the bomb, sending him to a high-rise with a subway below. He crosses the ledge just as Bane emerges from the sub, and Bane kills him in his non-bat-form by crushing Bruce's head. As Bane leaves, he takes Bruce's gun. Source: Wikipedia Bruce didn't want to die, but he figured that it's better to die by a proxy (Robin) than leaving himself vulnerable in
