Marc - Skid Row, the area on the fringe of downtown Los Angeles, has always catered to the down and out. Today, the homeless, the businessQ: Customizing the image in the right menu of the website I'd like to customise the images in the right-hand menu of the website. I tried finding how to do this here but found nothing. It seems like I should be editing the CSS but then I do not know where to look. Thanks. The right-hand menu is on this page - A: If you want to customize the images in the menu then you need to look at the CSS file for For example, the heading in the menu changes colour depending on the background-color of the div that the menu is in. If you then look at the css file you can see what colour the images are. For example, `div.menu{width:300px; padding:8px 0 0 0; overflow:hidden;margin:0;}`. Depending on what css you modify, the positioning of the images may change so you may need to modify other css files as well. Q: How does the following sentence properly say: 'I'm fortunate to have you'? Can this sentence be properly said? Which one is better? I'm fortunate to have you. or I'm fortunate to have you. Also, do we have to change it to an adjective before 'have'? I'm fortunate to have you as my friend. or I'm fortunate to have you as my friend. or does it have to be: I'm fortunate to have you as my friend A: The second of the two examples that you give does not appear to be a complete sentence. The first of them would be a perfectly good one, if you put the object first (though not necessarily after the verb.

If you put the object first, you'd want to drop "to have" and use a construction like "I'm fortunate to have you as my friend."): I'm fortunate to have you as my friend. Note that "have" can sometimes be used in
