Tamaam Irani,Rajshree,Shashi Ranjan,Shashi Sharma.If you've ever been to a football game, the last thing you want to do is get bumped and either wind up fumbling the ball or have it hit you in the head. So it's probably safe to assume that the NFL and its teams don't exactly want to see players banging into each other. But that's exactly what one member of the San Francisco 49ers did during a recent preseason game in Arizona. During a play in the second quarter of the game, right tackle Garry Gilliam of the 49ers is seen glancing a knee into the face of Redskins defensive end Kedric Golston. It's not clear if he did it on purpose, but the Redskins and fans certainly did not appreciate the hit. Golston was briefly knocked out of the game and finished it with three stitches in his forehead. There's no word on if there will be any punishment for Gilliam. Gilliam says he didn't do it on purpose, which is why fans are saying it was a rough play. Analyte detection is an important aspect of medical diagnostics. The ability to characterize a biological sample within minutes of collection is desirable for most clinicians. Combining these analytical capabilities with a point-of-care system allows clinicians to make instantaneous decision-making possible. Current commercial instruments require skilled technicians to operate and are not suitable for point-of-care application. Development of a microfabricated system capable of the detection of a range of analytes with high sensitivity
