On the last day of April 2019, the U.S. coal industry produced 10,933,537 short tons, or 2.1 billion metric tons. That's a drop of almost 280,000 tons (228 million metric tons) from the previous year. The 2018 number is slightly below the record set in 2016. And it comes more than a year after the record coal production of 2017. This means the United States has reached a new plateau of production, one where nobody expects to see a big increase — certainly not the 5 percent increase that industry boosters were touting just a few short years ago. The United States does produce more coal than it has in previous years, but only thanks to greater production in other countries. In all, the United States delivered only 2 percent of the world's coal last year, much of it destined for power plants in Asia. The U.S. coal boom of the past decade resulted from a combination of cheap natural gas and federal and state regulations that initially limited coal production, but once those restrictions were lifted, coal production exploded. Those restrictions had been set in place after the 1970s, when coal was blamed for skyrocketing U.S. air pollution (not true) and U.S. presidents repeatedly claimed coal was being mined at a
