Atherosclerosis is the leading cause of death in industrialized countries. It is a disease characterized by the accumulation of cholesterol-containing lipoproteins in the arterial wall, primarily low density lipoprotein (LDL). In humans, the majority of atherosclerotic lesions have cholesterol core that is covered with an endothelial monolayer and is enveloped by a fibrous cap. Cholesterol accumulation in the lesions commonly is attributed to an increase in LDL plasma levels. However, several recent studies suggest that cholesterol accumulation in human atherosclerotic lesions is not due to increased LDL levels. Although LDL receptor activity is diminished in atherosclerotic lesions, the majority of cholesterol is not derived from the LDL. Several other plasma cholesterol-carrying lipoproteins, known as remnant-like lipoproteins (RLPs), accumulate in atherosclerotic lesions. RLPs include low density lipoprotein (LDL) and intermediate density lipoprotein (IDL), both of which are particles of plasma triglyceride-rich lipoprotein remnants. Intermediate density lipoprotein is the cholesterol- and phospholipid-containing precursor to LDL and is highly atherogenic. Previous studies from this laboratory showed that this atherogenicity is due to selective uptake of LDL-cholesterol by aortic tissue and is mediated by specific receptors. Another study demonstrated that the isolated intermediate density lipoprotein particles also can be bound specifically and internalized by the human arterial tissue. Although the exact mechanism of this selective uptake of LDL
