When it comes to chasing pokémon, there's something about the smell of the thing. For the next twelve months, a group of designers and researchers at Tel Aviv University have been creating and deploying scent-based, augmented reality games for children and adults. To date, they've released a few variations of the game in the distance between Tel Aviv and Safed, a small city on the outskirts of the Israeli-occupied West Bank. They plan to expand to Jerusalem this winter. The experience is like Pokemon Go, but with a difference: instead of the user scanning the streets, a teacher at a local school wears a headset that detects any nearby pokémon, and then hurls a custom

“Poké ball” at it. The pokéball, delivered by an army drone, delivers the AR game to the user, who then needs to catch the pokémon. “It’s about making natural play a part of our daily lives,” says Jodie Bernstein, a mobile game designer at Tel Aviv University’s Computer Science and Engineering Department and lead coder for the game. If a kid collects a certain number of pokémon, he or she can take them to a local Pokemon center and exchange them for a stuffed pokémon. The process involves GPS tracking and reporting back to a centralized server. The team is not just messing around with pokémon. They are embedding AR layers in contemporary, real-life environments
