Tuning the Size of Chiral Ti-Oxalate Complex Particles by Solvent Vapor Response. Copper oxide particles with a diameter of 40-140 nm were prepared by sol-gel growth of chiral Ti( $\mu$ -oxalate)(OA)<sub>2</sub> and subsequent calcination in humid air. The chirality of the Ti-oxalate precursor solution was determined by the scattering pattern obtained with a polarized Zeiss LSM410. The particles were subsequently characterized with respect to their size by SEM and TEM, as well as their chiral composition by circular dichroism (CD) spectroscopy. The possible effect of the vapor composition of the surrounding atmosphere on the formed particles was investigated by carrying out growth experiments in nitrogen, argon, air, and oxygen. We found that in these experiments, besides the condensation of oxalic acid on the particle surface, the hydrolysis of water formed in the growth solution was an important reaction. At the same time the size of the obtained particles differed only slightly, as the complete hydrolysis of all bound water was always reached. Possible roles of the observed phenomena on the surface formation and on the crystallographic ordering of the particles are discussed.
