Naturally, a power outage typically results in power interruptions to home and business power systems. Many businesses are equipped with backup power systems, which are in many cases adequate to support their power needs during power interruptions. However, the cost of providing backup power systems can be high, and their operation still cannot guarantee that interruptions in primary power will result in an uninterrupted power supply.

Thus, there is a need to provide a reliable uninterrupted power supply in cases of a power outage, particularly in the case of heavy usage of a backup power supply.Can choroidal thickness be measured by optical coherence tomography in normal subjects?
