You will need to enable your GPU in games through the graphical user interface (WarpForce, Binding Agent) then games that have a GameSpy client should all have the option to update the "Software Version" in the game and the option to choose the target platform (PCSX2_users, PCSX2_source, Windows). If that's not the case then you can also try this: Go to the settings of your Pcsx2 game, the "Software Version" should be listed along with the game version number. Then you need to set up the software version and the game version number as one. An example: "v1.6.1.0.0 (0x7d:0x00003 - White)". Then go to the main menu and go to the "Load Game Settings" then you should see the entries for the latest version of the game. If the "Software Version" is not found then you should first check the "Set Entry Name to Version" and also use the same filename as the "Software Version" to avoid duplication. Then you should try to find the latest game version number by checking GameSpy website, PSN etc. If you have no luck then you can use the "Source" to set the "Software Version" or the "Windows" to set the game version number. If you have a game that has split files (PCSX2_users, PCSX2_source) and/or PXG files then you need to install the plugin for PCSX2_source. If you want to be able to install something from PCSX2_source then you need to make sure that the correct "Application ID" in the game file matches the PCSX2_users or the PCSX2_source ID. In most cases you'll have several DLLs for each GSdx version. SSE2, SSE4 and AVX2. Which one to choose depends on your CPU installed. Most of the time this will be selected automatically, otherwise users should select the proper plugin supported by their CPUs. If an user selects a plugin not supported by the CPU then they will be asked to select a different plugin.

direct3d and opengl hardware acceleration. it may not be the most feature-rich but it does the basics quite well. it supports a variety of rendering apis including directx and opengl and is compatible with most major video cards on the market. this means that when using it, the plugin's functions are exposed by the driver as it directly talks to the hardware, regardless of the software rendering. this makes it a very efficient plugin in comparison to software rendering. 5ec8ef588b
